THE GIPSY.

BY CAPTAIN CHARLES HOWARD.

Among the men who emigrated to one of our new popular Western States was Elias Storms, a miller, and a surly, unbending, close-fisted man. He lent many enemies and few friends in the Pennsylvania valley that he vacated, and numbers expressed the wish that the lordly Mississippi might roll forever between them and the miller. But while they rejoiced to see Elias Storms depart, there was not a person who wanted to see his daughter go.

George Storms had not inherited a single one of her father's foibles. She was loving and gentle to every one, and it was her face that brought much custom to the mill. She was Elias Storms' only child, and he guarded her vigilantly lest some forbidden lover might come and steal the hand which he intended should bring a fortune to his coffers.

The girl did not want to leave the beautiful valley where she had passed the halcyon period of her life, but her father was inexorable.

"I'm going to a country where neighbor does not hate his neighbor," said Elias Storms, compressing his lips. "Everybody hates me here, and never in my life have I harmed a single man. I believe I was born to be hated; the evil star in the heavens' first shone on the child who was called Elias Storms."

George, who was standing at the window that faced the mill, did not turn to her father sitting in the old armchair, with a paper in his lap, and a long silence followed the last words.

"I shall leave men, parting from whom will be accompanied with no regrets," at last Elias Storms continued, in the intensely bitter tone of which he was so wonted to speak, "but you, my daughter, you are my life, and it is to me the effect of his words would produce."

But she did not seek the names of the parties referred to by her father. Her silence rather piqued him.

"I had some hot words with a young man last night," he went on, "and I struck him. My blow brought blood; but he was too cowardly to resent it."

Then George turned from the window. "Father, with whom did you quarrel?" she asked, "and what was the cause of the difficulty? Won't you tell me?"

She came forward with a face slightly pale, and laid her hand on his shoulder.

"I will tell, though your look tells me that you could guess his name. George you are as white as ashes, and you tremble like a leaf. You have cruelly deceived me; I never dreamed that you could act thus. What would your mother say were she alive this day? You know she always hated him. Poor wife! she feared affairs were drifting to the pass they have reached. George, tell me without one particle of equivocation if you love Luke Colby."

He was on his feet, and faced his pale child while the last words dropped from his lips.

"Then you quarrelled with him?"

"Yes, and my hand brought blood to his forehead."

She grew paler than ever.

"On, do not fear; I did not maim the dog. I struck him for a challenge, that was all; but he was too cowardly to resent it."

"Cowardly? No!" cried George. "He would not strike you because I am your child."

"How chivalrous! We do not live in the middle ages. This is the nineteenth century, George Storms."

"I know it."

"But you have not answered my question. Do you love Colby?"

"I do."

Elias Storms ground his teeth.

"You may as well dismiss the foolish affection first as last," he said. "Last night he came down to the mill and asked for your hand. Ah! you knew he was going to do this. I told him no, and when he sought my reasons, I gave them."

"What were they?" asked George, meekly.

"I need not repeat them here; but I told him that a child could never become the wife of a scoundrel's son."

"Father, you were unfeeling," cried George, with rising indignation. "It has been pretty clearly established that David Colby was murdered. Such a man as he was would not put the price to his own head. You insured the memory of his father."

"And I told him to keep his distance hereafter. I told him to understand that I caught him within sound of my ears I would shoot him."

The words, darting like serpents from between Elias Storms' teeth, made George shrink away.

"That would be murder, father. He laughed."

"Well, let me be murdered! The blood of such men as he does not stain; and like water. When you see him again request him to remain this side of the Mississippi."

She did not speak for a moment.

"Already he has hidden me good-by."

"Ha!"

"Your answer last night drove him from Chesney. He would be here now if you had not quarrelled."

"Then you will write him. Tell him to keep his distance. You shall never become his wife. Do not tempt yourself on such hopes. Tell him to keep beyond the shadows that my new mills shall throw."

Then Elias Storms left the room, and George was alone.

She knew that the morrow would witness her departure for her new home beyond the 'fathers of waters,' and recalled that some of her young friends were coming that night to say farewell.

Suddenly she went up to her boudoir where the great trunk were already packed, and lifted the lid of one. She drew forth a packet of note paper, and with a pencil wrote these lines:

"DEAR LUKE.—I have just heard all from father. With the memories of the Past I shall try to beautify the Future. The great river shall not separate us long. Do not risk the life I love for me. Father says that the shadow of the new mills is as the shadow of death to you, and he warns you not to enter it. Luke, keep back! keep back! You do not know him as I do. Good bye."

GEORGIE.

She posted that letter quite early the following morning, and then, with her father and several apprentices, left the valley of her birth and childhood.

Two days later Luke Colby received George's letter, and read it twice.

He was a manly, handsome fellow, with strong limbs and much learning, and his love for the miller's daughter was steadfast and true. When firmly settled to a purpose nothing could turn him aside; and when he finished reading the letter for the second time, he looked up as if to reveal the smiles that played with his lips.

"What do I care for the shadow of Elias Storms' mills?" he said. "George, your father's threats can't keep me from crossing the Mississippi—they can't frighten me. So, when as Storms' mills cast a shadow I will enter it. I have entered the shadow of the upas tree! I know your father, George Storms. I know that he makes no idle threats."

Knowing this, Luke Colby waited for Storms' mills to cast a shadow, that he might enter it.

CHAPTER II.

THE SHADOW CONDENSES.

By and by a report came to Chesney concerning Elias Storms.

On the bank of a beautiful river, whose lucid waves lost themselves in the turbid Missouri, the miller had erected commodious mills, and was rapidly growing rich. His industry had ever been commendable, and people had said that Elias Storms could make money in a desert. Certain it was, that he had notions of returning to Chesney, where many had parted from him with no regrets.

Coupled with this report, was a piece of information that caused a flutter of surprise in the valley. It said that George had a lover beyond the lordly river, and that she would soon be a bride. I say that this report surprised many who knew that she had pledged undying love to Luke Colby, who had disappeared from Chesney shortly after her departure, nor had returned, for one day, to the town. To a few particular friends, he had confided his quarrel with the miller, and the contents of George's letter, and they feared that he had found his death in the shadows of Storms' new mills.

One day a young man left the rude hut of an Iowa town, and directed his steps toward a belt of timber visible from the suburbs. He was clad in the garb of a sportsman, and he wore the look of an amateur in the exhilarating profession of gunning. He crossed several rich pastures without rousing a grouse, and gained the summit of a pretty knoll that commanded a view of the surrounding country.

Near the farther edge of the valley that lay at his feet, he beheld a little crowd, consisting of several wagons and a number of animals.

"A gipsy camp," he murmured. "I wonder if this is the band that has such a pretty queen. I will go down and let some dusky soothsayer lift the veil of my fate."

A moment later he was leisurely descending the knoll, and having skirted a clear pond that lay in his path, he halted beneath an unbranched tree, and fastened his eyes upon a woman who was approaching from the gipsy camp.

She did not pause when she saw that he noticed her, but quickened her gait, and when he saw the dark eyes that burned passionately beneath drooping lashes, an ejaculation fell from his lips:

"Tis You, the gipsy queen—the girl I have lately heard so much about! Her people have turned their face to the Mississippi again. I wonder why they are going back. The settlers have no time to listen to the revealing of the future. The red man with his tomahawk is the prophet that speaks to them now!"

The gipsy girl halted before the young man, and made a formal courtesy.

She was quite beautiful, and her simple garments, fancifully arranged, made her look the wild wood queen she was. For several moments she gazed into the young man's eyes, and then
